Renal interstitial fibrosis, a common complication of chronic kidney disease, is initiated by epithelial-mesenchymal transition (EMT) followed by conversion of fibroblasts into myofibroblasts.

EMT/myofibroblasts have the phenotypes of increased cell proliferation, decreased apoptosis, and increased collagen synthesis. As a result of the physiological changes of apoptosis, fibroblasts become apoptosis resistant, leading to the accumulation of interstitial myofibroblasts and excessive extracellular matrix production. Many studies have identified the regulatory mechanism of apoptosis of fibroblast and the signaling pathways of fibroblast apoptosis resistant. Furthermore, many drug-targeted proteins of the apoptosis pathway have been found. Understanding the regulation of apoptosis will provide new insights into the development of renal interstitial fibrosis. The comments came a day after the British newspaper The Guardian and the Washington Post published accounts of surveillance activities of U.S. spy agencies, underscoring the seriousness of the leaks.
