An overview of the microsomal and cytochrome P450-dependent N-nitrosopyrrolidine-induced mutagenic activation process. N-Nitrosopyrrolidine (NPYR) is a potent carcinogen in the rat that requires activation by microsomal enzymes in order to induce tumors. Using known inhibitors of cytochrome P450, P450 isozymes associated with NPYR activation have been identified as CYP2E1 and CYP1A2. Biochemical and structural studies on the catalytic activity of purified P450 enzymes indicate that CYP2E1 can be activated by NPYR to produce the mutagenic adduct nitrosopyrrolidine pyrrolidine (NPYR pyrrolidine). Although the precise mechanism of activation is not known, structural studies and site-directed mutagenesis of CYP2E1 suggest that pyrrole nitrosation proceeds via two steps; first, nitroso-activation of an amino acid (e.g., Cys) to form an oxime followed by a second nitrosative step in which the formed oxime reacts with a second amino acid. This two-step mechanism of activation could be a general mechanism for the activation of other mammalian cytochrome P450. The second major P450 isozyme involved in the activation of NPYR is the 3da54e8ca3
