I'm trying to understand how the Java runtime works. is the @Override annotation added at class level and not individual methods? As a result I would expect there to be no way to override methods without changing the signature (similar to Perl's $@) Is it allowed and valid to add final to a method? A: It's allowed and valid as long as you don't use the @Override or @SuppressWarnings annotations. Overriding of methods and final are two different things. Allowing final on methods would be a bad idea because it would cause problems during method resolution, even though it's possible to do it in some situations. For example, when you override a final method, the compiler makes a note of this in the overridden version. If someone at another level (e.g. future API) wants to change the behavior of your overridden method, it needs to go through the process of updating your code. If you never change the behavior of your method, then it might as well be final. Adding final would only help
