Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an image recording apparatus in which image data is written in a digital-to-analog (D/A) converting circuit disposed downstream of a reading sensor. 2. Description of the Related Art There is known a flat-bed scanner as an apparatus for reading an original and outputting it as a recorded image. To prepare the input image for the flat-bed scanner, image data obtained by a reading sensor are transferred to a graphic memory through a D/A converting circuit. If the number of pixels of image data becomes large, the quantity of data to be transferred is increased. Thus, the speed of image data transfer is slow and the image data transfer takes time. If the transfer speed is to be increased, the capacity of a memory used in the D/A converting circuit is also increased. This causes an increase in cost. If the transfer speed is to be increased, the data transfer can be performed by accumulating the image data obtained by the reading sensor in a buffer memory or a cache memory. However, to read out the stored data from the buffer memory or the cache memory in real time, the data reading speed cannot be raised, so that the transfer speed becomes slow. This causes the problem that the quality of the recorded image is deteriorated.The Detroit Lions are headed to London for a rematch of last year's Wild Card round playoff game with the Chicago Bears. And it'll be at a time of year that has caused the league's scheduling gods to smile on the Lions — an NFL game on Christmas Eve.
