The Snowbank Method of Predicting Snowfall The snow depth metric is derived from the snow depth and snow duration at a weather station by means of linear regression. A threshold is applied to the residuals to distinguish between snow and no snow for the base month. The slope of the fitted regression line is used to predict snowfall from the base threshold for subsequent months. The snow depth metric for the month of January, 2011 is shown below. The remaining residuals are discarded. In this example, the threshold is set to 50cm. The residuals are shown below. The slope of the fitted regression line for the three previous snowfall months is 0.30 cm/day for the month of February, 0.21 cm/day for March and 0.20 cm/day for April. The January, 2011 snow depth is 2.69m. The residual of the fitted regression line is then applied to the January, 2011 snow depth to estimate snowfall. The snow forecast for February, 2011, March, 2011 and April, 2011 is calculated by multiplying the monthly residuals by these values. The snow forecast for January, 2011 is calculated by adding the monthly residuals to the January, 2011 snow depth. The residuals for February, 2011 and March, 2011 are positive. This indicates that the fitted regression line is correctly predicting snowfall. The residuals for April, 2011 are negative. The fitted regression line appears to be incorrectly
