He helped companies with their sales, marketing, and brand strategies. He was also a global expert in Smart Advertising and had multiple books on the market about marketing. He was a member of one of the first "social media" companies and was an innovator in the online advertising industry. He was an award winning professional in his field. But he never succeeded in his relationships. He was an expert in building relationships, but was terrible at responding to people. He had all the "skills" and background to read people and send a professional message to them, but he just couldn't figure out how to respond. He was so busy thinking about what to say, that he never said anything.

You know that feeling when you send an e-mail to a contact that you've never spoken to before and you don't know if you've actually spoken to them at all? Or that "we should be friends on FB" feeling when you get a message from a complete stranger that you simply must "LIKE" or "FOLLOW." Those are things that successful business people don't have to be good at. They just have to respond. You don't have to be a good artist. You don't have to be great at solving problems. You don't need to be an amazing salesperson. You don't need to be the best of anything to succeed in business. You just need to respond. And then respond. And then respond some more. Always, and then some more. And never stop responding. No matter who or where you are talking to. And then respond some more. In this crazy world of social media and fast paced networking, if you're not responding, you're dying. Nobody cares if you don't say anything. Nobody is going to read this text. It's stupid to spend time talking to someone if you're not going to say anything. And if they think that you're smart enough to be working for them and make them money, they're probably going to tune you out. So respond. Even if you don't have anything to say. Even if you're not sure who you're talking to. If you respond, even once, it's going to tell them something about c6a93da74d
